A quick tour of the current library is enough to convince anyone that CIIS needs a new home for its collection.

“We ran out of space for the library five years ago,” says Library Director Lise Dyckman, surrounded by crowded shelves of books. The collection has now spilled over to nearby classrooms and offices, and even to a rented storage facility down the street from CIIS.

“We’re also strapped for areas for students to do their work.” Dyckman points to the few tables in the current library that provide room to study. “We can only fit eighteen people and the library is often completely full.”

In response to this need, CIIS has commissioned architectural plans for a new and larger library, located on the second floor of the main building on Mission Street. The stunningly designed new space will more than double the areas for students to study. At this point the only obstacle to carrying out the renovation is funding.

“The stunningly designed new space will more than double the areas for students to study.”

“We’ve now raised one third of the more than $500,000 needed for the library renovation,” says CIIS President Joseph L. Subbiondo. “We’re very grateful for a generous unrestricted gift from the J.C. Kellogg Foundation that we’ve applied to this critical project, and for another donation to be announced. The renovation is needed now so that we can have more space for the library and for studying. We also need to vacate the current library space to make room for classrooms and offices for the expanding academic programs here.”

The CIIS library is named in honor of Laurance S. Rockefeller, an early and major donor to the Institute. To find new funding for the library renovation, the CIIS board of trustees has set this project as a high priority. “A good library should be inviting and conducive for study and discussion,” says Prasad Vepa, CIIS board chair. “It should be an intellectual focal point for students and faculty alike. The time has come for us to expand, relocate, and renovate our library to meet our growing needs befitting the caliber of our scholarly pursuits.”

Once the remaining funds for the new library are secured, the work will move forward quickly. “The construction could all be done in four to six months,” says Jonathan Mills (EWP ’09), CIIS director of facilities and operations. “We can start the work at any time because the location is a vacant part of the building on the second floor.”

Mills is very pleased with the design of Cheryl Lentini of Beverly Prior Architects, a firm that has done work for many colleges in the Bay Area and nationally. “The design is as green as possible,” Mills explains. “The main reading area where students will be bathed in natural light from the south windows. The plan calls for wood, cork, or recycled materials wherever possible. There are natural shapes in the wave-curve of the window seat that runs the length of the reading area.”
We are beginning what may well be the best academic year ever for CIIS. This fall, the number of new students increased by 29 percent and total students by 10 percent. CIIS now enrolls over 1,300 students. Our foundation support is off to a notable start—we have received $210,000 from The California Wellness Foundation; $367,000 from the City and County of San Francisco; and $150,000 from the J.C. Kellogg Foundation. Our alumni and friends are giving at unprecedented levels. We have launched our new website, which has greater capacity to reflect the distinctive nature of our university; and we are sponsoring our most ambitious schedule ever of Public Programs, which introduces CIIS to many new and varied communities.

To ensure that our growth is grounded in thoughtful planning, we have nearly completed our revision of the CIIS Strategic Plan, a revision required because we effectively implemented our previous plan. Our updated plan calls for CIIS to continue to lead in integral higher education, reflect a diverse and multicultural community, serve as an agent of transformation in local and global communities, and model planned and balanced growth. As has been true throughout the Institute’s history, these goals can be achieved only with your continued support and loyalty.

I strongly believe that CIIS is on the ascent because it is meeting the most significant needs of our time—it is building bridges across the many divides that separate us, whether spiritual, educational, ecological, cultural, or economic. I look forward to working with you to realize the potential of this moment as we imaginatively and confidently create our future.

IIS has always had public events,” says the Institute’s director of Public Programs, Karim Baer. “The early lectures of Dr. Haridas Chaudhuri took place at the same time CIIS started.” Since those talks four decades ago, the Institute has dramatically expanded its offerings of Public Programs to make it a major local presenter of concerts and of workshops. Attendance is up, classes are multiplying, and CIIS is using venues now in three different parts of the Bay Area.

“As recently as five years ago” says Baer, “we offered about one concert a year. In 2009–10, we’re presenting eight different programs.” Upcoming presenters include the Soweto Gospel Choir at the Paramount Theatre in Oakland on March 27, Rumi translator Coleman Barks collaborating with the Tibetan singer Yungchen Lhamo on April 15, and renowned sitar player Anoushka Shankar on April 28.

Attendance at CIIS Public Programs has skyrocketed from about 1,000 three years ago to 7,500 in the last academic year. Public Programs has also been expanding its offerings of classes on spiritual inquiry, professional development, and creative expression.

“I used to have to recruit instructors,” says Baer. “Now they’re coming to us. We’re hosting workshops with many of the most renowned spiritual teachers.” Almost all classes are offered at a discount to students at CIIS. Many workshops provide credit to students at the Institute; and Continuing Education Units to therapists, psychologists, and nurses.

“We’re also including lectures on a wider variety of topics,” says Baer. “For instance, we’re presenting speakers now who connect world affairs and religion. One of the most memorable events we’ve hosted in recent years was a talk by British theologian Karen Armstrong on “Understanding Islam and the West.” That event brought together people from many faiths and was cosponsored by Christian, Islamic, and Jewish organizations. One person told me it changed her worldview.”

How does Baer choose presenters for Public Programs? “The events should be as diverse as the music on your IPod or the books on your shelf.”

Public Programs is also working with CIIS President Joseph L. Subbiondo and faculty from the Institute to produce a national conference this spring on “Expanding the Circle: Creating an Inclusive Environment in Higher Education for LGBTQ Students and Studies.” The conference will take place at the Hotel Nikko in San Francisco from February 25 to 28. It will be the first conference that brings together administrators, faculty, staff, and campus chaplains from all over the U.S. to focus on lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer issues at colleges and universities.

Public Programs also offers certificate programs in Yoga Philosophy and in Sound, Voice, and Music Healing that feature some of the world’s most esteemed teachers in those fields, including Grammy Award-winning frame drummer Glen Velez, the Institute’s own Silvia Nakkach, and world-renowned yoga teacher TKV Desikachar.

Why is Public Programs so concerned with expanding its scope and its programs? “We live in a society that’s often very fragmented,” says Baer. “We don’t cross bridges to other cultures as much as we could. We want to encourage people to interact and to form relationships outside of their usual circles and to experience new artists and ideas.”

“Attendance at CIIS Public Programs has skyrocketed from about 1,000 three years ago to 7,500 in the last academic year.”

The Regenerative Powers of Findhorn

by Clara Lindstrom (EWP '06)

It was cold, starving, and exhausted when the train pulled into the Forres Station on a rainy February night. After a long and circuitous journey, just a few miles separated me from my destination: the little community of Findhorn in northern Scotland. At the behest of CIIS president Joe Subbiondo, I had come to explore a possible collaboration between CIIS and this extraordinary village with the distinction of having the smallest ecological footprint in the industrialized world.

I could describe the origins of Findhorn—the gardens that sprang out of sandy soil and the mysterious plant devas—but those stories can be found in the many books on the subject. Likewise, Findhorn’s programs in sustainability, environmental leadership, and community building are on their website.

No, what begs describing is the quite miraculous foundation of—to put it simply—love that grounds the community. It feels like a tangible field that has been physically generated through years of collective, conscious intention; as solid as the centuries-old stone walls of Scotland.

This “field” was tested for me in an alarming way within hours of arriving. As a participant in Experience Week, (a program to introduce visitors to Findhorn), I found my room in the gorgeous old Cluny Hotel before taking a group tour of the grounds. As we walked, I became uncomfortably aware that perhaps it hadn’t been the best idea to turn over the floppy mattress on my bed, as whatever had gone “snap!” in my back was getting worse. I staggered along in increasing pain, determined to maintain a professional demeanor—I was here representing CIIS, after all! This was not some indulgent personal retreat. In fact, the thing I hate most in the world is to stick out as “the one with the problems.” I don’t want to impose myself on others. I don’t want to be pitied. I don’t want to be vulnerable and most of all I don’t want to be tended to.

Well, guess what happened? I got exactly what I needed, of course. Within half an hour I was lying in the fetal position, unable to move and in excruciating pain, smack in the middle of the bustling sitting room floor. I immediately had not one but three people tending to me, and to my utter horror I realized that disappearing was not an option. As my psyche scrambled for an out, tears of frustration and then surrender washed my cheeks.

The gentle grace with which community members responded was overwhelming. I was not made a spectacle. I was not pitied. I was neither fussed over nor frowned upon. I was made to feel that whatever was happening—however it looked—was absolutely acceptable. Welcome, even. My process (which lasted days) was witnessed with unwavering compassion and not a trace of expectation that it be anything other than what it was. Very, very rarely do I experience this quality of attention in the rest of the world.

Findhorn proved to be a container that had the strength to hold anything offered up by our group, however volatile or intense. We felt held not by a flimsy aura that would dissolve when the week was up, but rather by the reality of a living, working community; people who circle up at the beginning of each work shift—whether chopping vegetables or cleaning toilets—to check in and set intentions; who invoke a sense of the sacred on a daily basis and in the most mundane circumstances; who talk about angels and plant devas as comfortably as they discuss cutting-edge ecological engineering projects. It feels deeply satisfying to locate one’s daily actions within a larger cosmological framework, and the folks at Findhorn have this “work-as-service” consciousness down to a lyrical art—indeed, a profound practice.

I realize we can’t just hold hands and “group process” to save the world. Yet I firmly believe that the sense of psychic safety and deep allowing that Findhorn models is an extremely powerful catalyst for transformation and healing. Its spiritual resources feel both limitless and incredibly rooted. And it is this rootedness that allows them to manifest such an astounding array of fruits in the physical world, from the Living Machine sewage treatment (look it up!) to their myriad programs in sustainable leadership and community activism.

I have absolute confidence that a collaboration between Findhorn and CIIS is meant to happen. Both are institutions on the forward edge of consciousness; both house a community of revolutionary—and evolutionary—thinkers. The time for transformation is now. Our collaboration will have a ripple effect far beyond the spheres of Findhorn and CIIS.
CIIS Welcomes Largest Cohort of New Faculty in Its History

This fall CIIS proudly greets the largest group of new faculty since the Institute began. The recent hires include additions to all three schools: Consciousness and Transformation, Professional Psychology, and Undergraduate Studies.

“It’s unusual to be hiring so many faculty at once,” says Judie Wexler, academic vice president, “but there are quite a few because we’re growing. We have a stellar group of new faculty.”

This round of searches to find new faculty has been particularly competitive. The new associate professor in Social and Cultural Anthropology, Brian Keith Axel, was chosen from a field of 130 applicants. He comes to CIIS after teaching at several other universities: Stanford, Duke, Swarthmore, and UC Santa Cruz.

He has published two full-length books with Duke University Press, including a study of the Sikh diaspora, which Nicholas B. Dirks of Columbia University has described as, “Historical anthropology at its best.”

The search for an assistant professor in Philosophy, Cosmology, and Consciousness lasted two years, with the search committee ultimately selecting Elizabeth Allison. She earned a PhD from UC Berkeley in Environmental Science, Policy, and Management, and two very different credentials from Yale: a master’s of religion and a master’s in environmental management.

Why such a divergent degrees?

“We pride ourselves at CIIS on our interdisciplinary approach,” says Wexler. “We want faculty who will be innovative thinkers and teachers. It’s not surprising that several of the new hires have degrees in varying fields and put together concepts from different disciplines.”

Three of the recent faculty hires are with the new Department of Writing, Consciousness, and Creative Inquiry, which offers the Master of Fine Arts degree. “I’m thrilled to have fiction writer Carolyn Cooke, dancer/choreographer Anne Bluethenthal, and novelist Sarah Stone join our department as core faculty,” says Department Chair Cindy Shearer. “Accomplished teachers and award-winning artists, they bring much depth and real-world arts experience to our students.”

One of the faculty members beginning work this academic year is a CIIS graduate, Fernando Castrillon, assistant professor in the Community Mental Health program. Professor Castrillon earned his doctorate in Clinical Psychology. He was instrumental in laying the foundation for the curriculum of the new Community Mental Health program through his work in interviewing current practitioners in the field to get their input on the program’s course of study. “CIIS’s passionate pursuit of the unorthodox and potentially transformative led me to apply to teach here,” says Castrillon.

Another recent hire is Mark Ludwig, who has joined the Somatic Psychology program. He feels he’s found his intellectual home at CIIS: “The development of Somatic psychotherapy is my life’s work. CIIS is a worldwide center for Somatic psychology theory and practice. The CIIS faculty in this area are unsurpassed.”

Barbara Morrill, a new faculty member in Integral Counseling Psychology, also mentions the Institute’s mission and her colleagues as reasons she chose CIIS: “First and foremost, I have a love, curiosity, and awe at the soul’s evolution, and have been deeply inspired by the faculty here to pass it forward.”

The hiring process these new faculty members went through reflects the Institute’s unique ideals and priorities. “Faculty who come here have to be interested in teaching,” says Academic Vice President Wexler. “They have to really want to work with students.” At least one student sits on every search committee, a practice that very few universities follow. “Candidates who come for an interview also have to do a presentation for students,” says Wexler. “The quality of that presentation and the reactions to it are important factors in deciding to offer someone a position here.”

On May 1, 2009, CIIS held a “Symposium on Integral Consciousness” in Namaste Hall. The symposium showcased cutting-edge research in transformative and integral studies and featured thirty-one presenters. The speakers included faculty, students, alumni, staff, and guests. The topics ranged from a panel on integral healing to a talk on the spiritual dimensions of ecology. The symposium was held in honor of Dr. Haridas Chaudhuri, CIIS’s co-founder.

"Since its inception CIIS has been a pioneer in integral education,” says Bahman Shirazi, who organized the symposium. Shirazi (EWP ’94) is a faculty member and the CIIS archivist. "As we mature as an educational institution, we hope to continue to deepen our understanding of the importance and relevance of integral consciousness to the planetary changes taking place.”

The event lasted all day and into the evening and many talks were standing-room only. Audience members participated actively in the dialogue. Two students from Humboldt State University drove all the way from Arcata near the Oregon border to attend.

Several speakers involved the audience directly in a presentation. Joanna Zweig, who earned her PhD in Integral Studies in 2007, broke the room into two-person teams to illustrate her session on “Fostering Group Coherence in Integral Consciousness.” Zweig asked each team to talk about an experience where group coherence had moved a project forward when individual efforts did not succeed. The excited response of the duos in the audience seemed to bear out Zweig’s thesis.

Linking the pooled energy of groups to spiritual teachings, Zweig cited her work with software development groups and theater production teams to point out that collective energy will often make dramatic breakthroughs where several people working alone get stuck at an obstacle. “Our culture is focused on individuals,” said Zweig, “but what about the creativity of groups? One of the very few culturally acceptable examples occurs in a jazz group, where the musicians make collective music.”

Charles Flores also linked practical applications to the spiritual dimension in his presentation. Flores, a doctoral student in East-West Psychology, works as the coordinator of a juvenile drug court in Contra Costa County. Many of the people he sees in his job are youth involved in gangs. “I look at integral yoga as being very practical,” he said. “Sri Aurobindo was a great activist before he was a yogi.”

In his research Flores interviewed ten individuals he considers practitioners of integral yoga, socially involved people who approach their political work with a spiritual attitude.

“I found two themes that recurred,” Flores recounted. “One was samatha—Sanskrit for the descent of peace. If you have the ability to find that stillness, you have a lot more potential to act than if you are beholden to the winds.”

The second factor Flores found in common was a strong calling, which he identified with the idea of swabhava—“intrinsic nature” in Sanskrit. “There is a part you play in the symphony,” Flores continued, “a particular role. What you decide to do stems from that understanding, deep in the spiritual fountain.”

The peer-reviewed journal ReVision will dedicate more than one special issue to publishing talks from the symposium.

“Given the critical significance of the topic to the mission of CIIS and the fact that so many attended the symposium, I’m glad that Bahman Shirazi is preparing an encore in spring 2010,” says CIIS President Joseph L. Subbiondo.

In addition to cofounding CIIS, Dr. Haridas Chaudhuri and Bina Chaudhuri also started the Cultural Integration Fellowship, a nonsectarian and nonprofit religious and educational organization devoted to the concepts of universal religion, cultural harmony, and creative self-unfolding. Located in San Francisco’s Richmond District, the Cultural Integration Fellowship presents a variety of programs on spirituality, music, art, health, and other topics. Visit their website at www.culturalintegrationfellowship.org.
Jessa Brie Berkner, a recent graduate of CIIS’s Bachelor of Arts Completion Program, was honored by having the high school drama department she heads selected for an international theater festival.

Berkner directs the drama department at Oakland Technical High School, and her program was invited to perform at the celebrated Fringe Festival in Edinburgh, Scotland in August 2010.

Berkner credits her education at CIIS for playing a critical role in helping her students achieve this prestigious honor. “To create the play that was selected by the festival, I taught the Oakland Tech students the research-based inquiry that I learned in the Integral Studies program at CIIS,” says Berkner. “The students used the tools of an anthropologist to go into their community and research what became a full-length play.”

Oakland Tech was selected to travel to Edinburgh as one of the fifty best high school drama departments in the United States. They will perform in the American High School Theatre Festival (AHSTF) in the 2010 Edinburgh Fringe Festival, part of the world-famous performing arts celebration that takes place each summer in that Scottish city.

“For an inner-city public high school to be represented at a topnotch international theater program is such an achievement for the students, for our school, and for our city,” says Oakland Tech student Molly Katz.

Two thousand high school drama programs were nominated to apply for participation in AHSTF. Although six Oakland schools have received invitations to the Fringe Festival in the past, Oakland Tech is the first public school from that city to be invited to Edinburgh. Of the four Bay Area high schools selected this year, Berkner’s program at Oakland Tech is the only one from a public school.

Oakland Technical High School drama students need to raise significant funds to finance their participation in the Fringe Festival. For more information, please contact Ms. Berkner at jessabrie@gmail.com or visit http://www.oaklandtech.com.

C IIS has received a grant of $210,000 from The California Wellness Foundation for the Community Mental Health (CMH) program. This grant will sponsor scholarships for students of color with financial need with a total of $70,000 in funds in each of three years. The grant is part of the foundation’s “Diversity in the Health Professions” initiative.

“This grant will help CIIS to do our part to address the acute need for culturally competent and diverse mental health professionals to serve the needs of California,” says CIIS President Joseph L. Subbiondo. “Only six percent of psychologists in the U.S. are people of color, while more than half the population of California is in that category.”

Subbiondo noted that the Community Mental Health program has a goal of training 200 marriage and family therapists for service in the public and nonprofit sectors in the next decade. “One of our main goals for the CMH program is to make sure that at least half of those graduating are students of color,” adds Subbiondo.

CIIS received several grants for the Community Mental Health program in its first year. Other supporters include the Lisa and John Pritzker Family Fund and the San Francisco Foundation. The program had eighteen students enrolled in its first cohort and welcomed twenty-five students in its second cohort this fall.

Created in 1992 as an independent, private foundation, The California Wellness Foundation’s mission is to improve the health of the people of California by making grants for health promotion, wellness education, and disease prevention.

MCJ Amelior Foundation Donates Funds for Drama Therapy Scholarships

The MCJ Amelior Foundation has given $10,000 to CIIS to provide financial support for students in the Drama Therapy program. The funds will set up an MCJ Scholars program to give financial assistance to individuals in the practicum phase of their studies. Through their placements, these students each provide hundreds of unpaid hours of counseling and therapeutic services to diverse populations of Bay Area children, teens, and adults in a wide variety of community hospitals, clinics, schools, and nonprofit agencies.

“The Drama Therapy program is most grateful to the MCJ Amelior Foundation,” says program director Renée Emunah. “This is the first time we’ve been able to offer support to students conducting practicums in community mental health facilities.”

One of the first recipients of an MCJ Amelior Foundation scholarship is second-year student Andrea Thring. Andrea is originally from Vancouver Island, Canada. In her practicum work at the Living Arts Counseling Center in Oakland, Andrea is “realizing how sacred therapy really is.” This fall, Andrea is leading an eleven-week, low-cost drama therapy group for women in Oakland exploring identity, relationships, and other issues. She also interns with San Francisco’s renowned Medea Project: Theater for Incarcerated Women. After graduation Andrea hopes to remain in San Francisco and continue working with women, particularly those who haven’t had access to therapy. Andrea feels “really grateful to be studying here, meeting the people I’m meeting. There are so many open doors in San Francisco and at CIIS.”

The design also includes areas for group study. These private carrels will be particularly useful to students in the counseling programs, who often go over video material together. The new library will also contain an unusual feature: “We’re planning to include a reference office where librarians can meet students for intensive one-on-one work to advance their research goals,” says Dyckman. “That’s the kind of attention we’ll be able to give students in this facility.”

The new space will also consolidate library staff, who are now scattered in offices outside the library. “If a student has a question, the person who can answer it will be right here, not down the hall,” says Dyckman.

Dyckman sees one of the important roles of the library as disseminating the work that CIIS creates: “Part of our mission is to get the Institute’s work out into the world. The library is not just raw materials, it’s the repository of the finished products.” The collection includes more than 1,200 student dissertations and theses. The library is particularly strong in areas such as women’s spirituality, cosmology, and East-West comparative studies, fields that many educational institutions lack significant holdings in.

“We do a thriving trade in interlibrary loans,” says Dyckman. “We loan over 7,000 library items a year to students, researchers, and public libraries throughout the U.S. Interestingly, many of the loans go out to Christian colleges where there are few materials on comparative religion.”

CIIS’s library also contains many rare items. “We’re one of only seven libraries in the country that has the full Chinese Buddhist Canon, printed in the 1930s,” says Dyckman. This multi-volume set is bound in red silk and contains beautiful illustrations reproduced from books that may no longer exist. The complete set was given to the Institute thanks to the efforts of Caifang Jeremy Zhu, a PhD candidate in Asian and Comparative Studies, who was studying at a monastery in China when he encountered the set.

The library also features unusual special collections, such as the books that personally belonged to Alan Watts, author, philosopher, and former faculty member at the American Academy of Asian Studies, a forerunner of CIIS. The collections also include the personal papers of Dr. Haridas Chaudhuri, cofounder of CIIS; and materials used to compile a documentary on Marija Gimbutas, who first described the matriarchal cultures of Neolithic Europe.

“Since we bought the building on Mission Street,” says Mills, “this is our first chance to reclaim space in line with our own priorities and aesthetics. My hope is that we can get started on the construction sooner rather than later.”
